WAREHOUSE RECEIPTS
NEGOTIABLE COLLATERAL

HOLDERS OF COTTON CAN DEPOSIT SAME IN BONDED WAREHOUSE, SECURE RECEIPT FOR IT AND GET MONEY ON RECEIPT.

The following from the Atlanta News is of great importance to cotton growers all over the south:

The unanimity of purpose to hold their cotton, as evidenced by the recent meeting of the Cotton Growers' Association in New Orleans, and the thorough organization of the cotton producers in all of the cotton states, brings into prominence the question of warehousing and properly taking care of the cotton, which will be held back until the consumptive demand of the world warrants offering it at a price remunerative to the producer.

A great deal has been said and written on this subject, especially in reference to a form of receipt backed up by such financial and moral responsibility as to make it desirable collateral for loans, not only in this country, but abroad.

This subject was extensively discussed at the convention of cotton growers in New Orleans, but the promoters of the various plans proposed seemed more interested in their pet schemes than in the men who raised the cotton. The reason the farmers did not manifest more interest in the question was doubtless due to the fact that the scheme proposed involved the construction of elaborate and expensive fire proof warehouses throughout the southern states; said warehouses to be under the control of the Central Company, organized by the promoters of this plan. It is doubtless apparent to the common sense, practical cotton planter that the plan outlined would require years to put into operation and that the storing and handling of cotton under this system would be very expensive, entailing a burdensome tax on his cotton.

Any grower of cotton, whether large or small, of reputable standing and good credit, can very readily hold at home without any expense during the picking and ginning season such part of his crop as he does not care to sell, getting from his merchant, or local bank, such financial accommodation as he requires. He is, therefore, not under the necessity of sending his cotton to a warehouse, where charges will begin to accrue at once.

The cotton grower has great advantage over the northern farmer in that he requires no expensive granary to house his product. If he has no vault house or available sheds, a few poles to keep the bales off of the ground is all that is needed at the beginning of the season, or during the fall and winter months. Each farmer thus becomes his own warehouseman for several months in the year. By properly separating the bales the risk of fire is almost eliminated, but if insurance is desired it can be readily obtained at about as low rate as in the best warehouses where large quantities of cotton are stored.

As already stated, any farmer can hold his cotton at home early in the season, and, if in good credit, can get all the accommodation required. The time of pressure is later in the season when the warm rains of spring set in, when cotton not properly housed is liable to very serious damage, and, moreover, when the interior banks and merchants require their funds for advances in planting the new crop. When this period arrives some form of relief is needed, and in order that the interior banks and merchants may not be compelled to force the planter to sell the cotton which he has been holding at home it becomes necessary to place it in a warehouse and have issued therefor a receipt that will be good collateral not only at the local bank, but in any other financial centers of the world.

The custom has been to ship cotton to the compress or concentrating points in order to make it available for loans, but it has been difficult at all times to get eastern financial institutions to lend money on interior compress receipts, with no knowledge of the responsibility of the companies issuing said receipts.

Most of the prominent points in the cotton states are well provided with compresses, and most of these compresses have good warehouse facilities, sufficient to take care of the surplus cotton. If not, their storage capacity could be quickly increased to meet the requirements. The only difficulty heretofore has been the acceptability of the receipts issued by these compresses as collateral to parties outside of the local banks.

What seems to be a step in the direction of a final solution of this problem has been taken by the Atlantic Compress Company, of Atlanta, Ga., and the Gulf Compress Company, of Memphis, Tenn., of which companies Mr. C. C. Hanson, of Atlanta, is president, and to which attention was called some time ago.

These companies operate about forty compresses distributed through seven states. According to The Insurance Herald of January 19th, they have perfected an arrangement with the American Bonding Company, of Baltimore, a strong financial institution, in which the bonding company appoints, in each town where these companies operate compresses, a local agent who, upon request, attaches to the warehouse receipt issued by them a certificate of the bonding company, guaranteeing the genuineness and the integrity of the receipt to which it is attached.

It is said that a number of large banks and institutions and trust companies in the east have approved this plan and look with great favor upon these receipts as collateral for loans and are offering money in large sums at very low rates of interest when secured by these guaranteed receipts.

This plan seems to secure all of the objects for which the other elaborate schemes are aiming and has the advantage of being immediately effective.

We see no reason why all of the compresses of the south cannot make a similar arrangement, thus furnishing facilities for carrying over the surplus cotton crop at minimum interest rates and at limited expense.
